How My Disability Shaped My Decision to Study Sciences at UBC

When I was ten years old, I was diagnosed with ADHD. My pediatrician in addition to medication, recommended a holistic approach to managing my condition, emphasizing vigorous daily exercise. This prescription not only helped me manage my symptoms but also ignited a lifelong passion for health and fitness. Reflecting on my journey, I realize how profoundly my disability has shaped my decision to study sciences at the University of British Columbia (UBC) with the goal of becoming a doctor.

Fitness has been a cornerstone of my ADHD management. My routine includes an hour of weightlifting six days a week, complemented by cardio sessions after big meals. This regimen has provided structure, discipline, and a sense of accomplishment, which are crucial for managing ADHD. The physical benefits of exercise have been immense, but the mental and emotional resilience it has fostered are even more significant. Through fitness, I learned the importance of a holistic approach to health, which includes physical activity, nutrition, and mental well-being. This comprehensive view of health has been instrumental in shaping my desire to study sciences, as it highlighted the interconnectedness of different aspects of health and the importance of a well-rounded approach to medicine.

My focus on health and fitness extended beyond personal benefits to include community service and leadership. As a member of my school's First Responder's Club, I underwent extensive training in first aid, allowing me to serve as a medical leader for my classmates and support emergency medical personnel during school events. This role has been incredibly fulfilling, providing me with hands-on experience in emergency medical situations and allowing me to make a tangible impact on my school community. Additionally, my involvement in the First Responder's Club has reinforced my commitment to pursuing a career in medicine, highlighting the critical need for knowledgeable and compassionate medical professionals.

Volunteering has been another significant aspect of my journey. I have dedicated many hours to volunteering at elementary schools, medical clinics, and Métis heritage events, sharing my skills, knowledge, and enthusiasm for health and fitness. One of the most impactful experiences was a week-long outreach trip to Haida Gwaii. Working alongside medical professionals, we administered hearing tests to patients and initiated a research project aimed at improving otolaryngology care in remote Indigenous communities. This experience was transformative, broadening my understanding of healthcare disparities and the unique challenges faced by remote communities.

The trip to Haida Gwaii was not only an eye-opener but also a confirmation of the passion I feel for serving others. Through our efforts, we provided essential healthcare services and laid the foundation for improved healthcare strategies that positively impact the lives of those in need. The experience reinforced my belief in the importance of accessible and equitable healthcare for all communities. It also underscored the need for continuous research and innovation in medicine to address healthcare disparities.

My disability and the holistic approach to managing it have profoundly influenced my decision to study sciences at UBC. The journey has taught me resilience, empathy, and the importance of a comprehensive approach to health. It has also fueled my passion for medicine and my commitment to making a difference in the lives of others. As I embark on my academic journey at UBC, I am driven by the desire to integrate my personal experiences with my academic pursuits, with the ultimate goal of becoming a doctor who not only treats diseases but also promotes overall well-being and health equity.

In conclusion, my disability has been a significant catalyst in shaping my aspirations and career goals. The challenges and triumphs of living with this disability have instilled in me a deep understanding of the importance of holistic health, community service, and continuous learning. These experiences have guided me towards a path of studying sciences at UBC, with the aspiration of becoming a compassionate and dedicated doctor. Through this journey, I aim to contribute to the field of medicine and make a positive impact on the lives of others.
